Paradise Point State Park

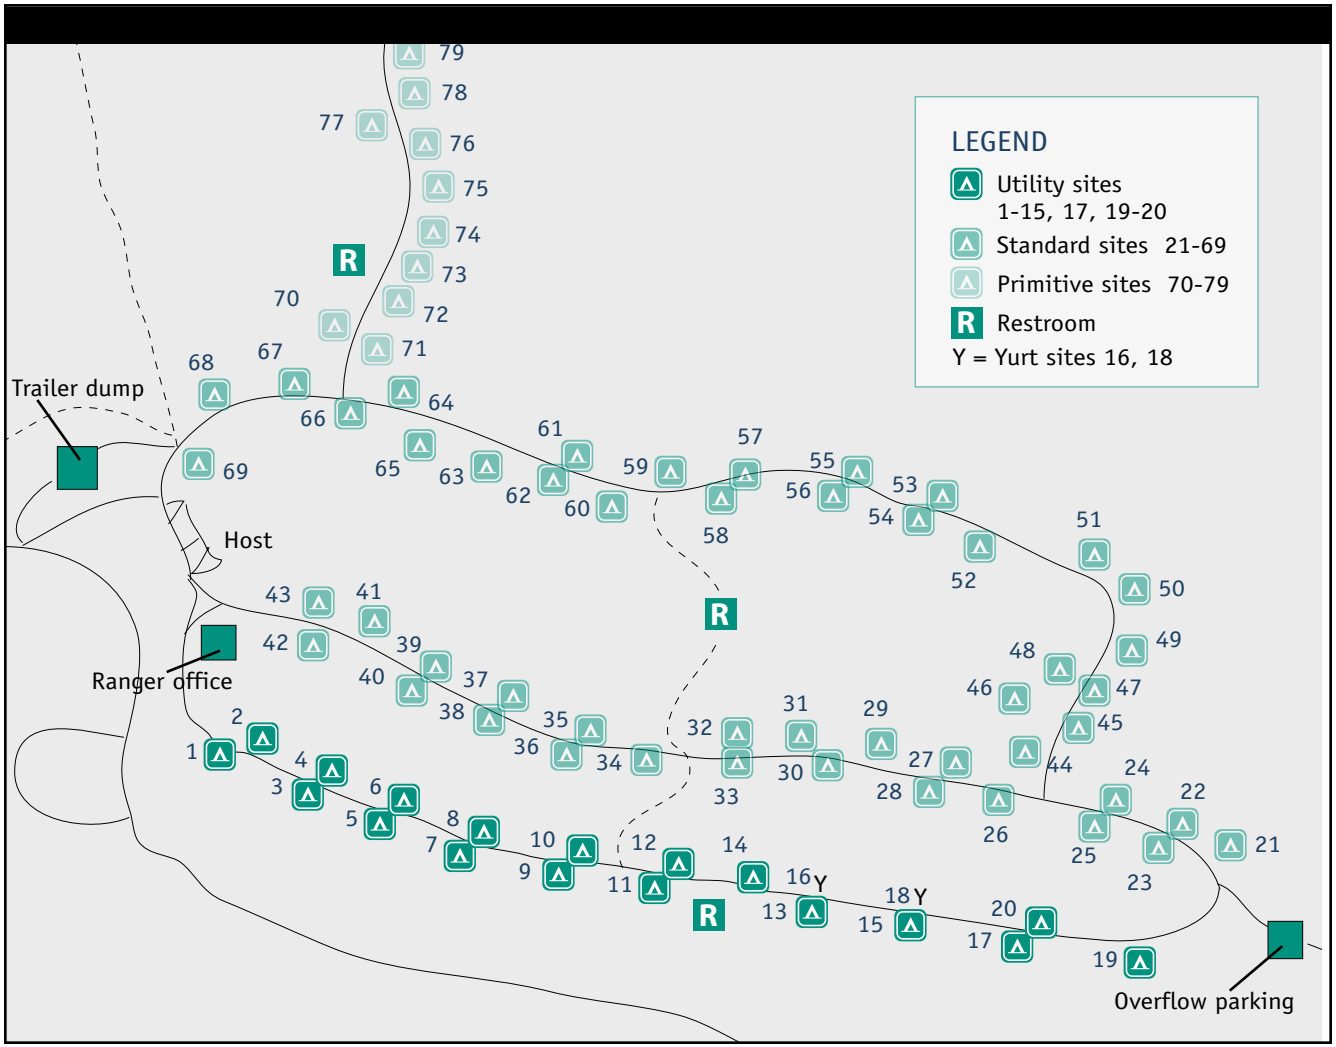
Welcome to Paradise Point State Park

Paradise Point State Park is an 88-acre camping park with 6,180 feet of freshwater shoreline immediately east of the interstate, near Woodland in Southwest Washington.

Paradise Point is forested with Douglas-fir, cedar, alder and hemlock and supports wildlife such as deer, elk, raccoons, chipmunks and coyote. Many types of birds, including dove, hawk, heron, woodpecker and wren can be seen at the park.

Visitors to the park have many recreational opportunities for hiking, bicycling, picnicking, fishing and boating. Swimming in the Lewis River is at visitor's own risk as no lifeguards are on duty. The park has two miles of trails and a small apple orchard. Interpretive programs vary from week to week.

The park, which lies near Interstate 5, now offers travelers a camping stop when traveling. The area possesses great natural beauty, and highway noise can be avoided by using woodland campsites in the park.

The park has 18 utility campsites, 49 standard campsites, 10 primitive campsites, two yurts (reservable year round), one dump station, two restrooms, four ADA restrooms and four showers (two ADA). Some of the campsites are in a grassy area, and the primitive sites are in the woods. Maximum site length is 40 feet (limited availability). Campsites may be reserved between May 15 and Sept. 15. To make a reservation, visit us online at www.parks.wa.gov or call (888) CAMPOUT or (888) 226-7688.


Paradise Point State Park was acquired by Washington State Parks in six parcels between 1958 and 1986. Two stories claim credit for the park's name. In one story, local tribes used the area for encampment along the east side of the Lewis River and called it "Paradise Point." In another, a motorboat club from Portland, Oregon used to travel to Kaner Rock on the Lewis River for river trips and camping. They called the area "Paradise Point."
